The home of my girlhood was to me almost an Eden. My father's mansion stood beside the relling waters of the great Pedes. The grand old poplars that fringed the winding aveone, are woven like an emerald chain in my history; and now, when dreams portray then to my eager vision, the sweet associations with which they are so closely twined, come back again, and I am once more the happy girl I used to be. I was fifteen. I remember well who: the first shadow fell across my pathway. Death came, with my mother's name on his cold lips, and called her to heaven. She had been for years an invalid; a victim to the wasting fires consumption, that gleamed in the hectic lectures in the city where they had first seen each bloom on either cheek.

And the fettered stream, that had so long hushed its merry song, was mingling its music with the low chirp of new-fled birdlings, perched in the hanging branches that dipped their leaves in its sparkling waters, as it gurgled on to the broad bosom of the mighty river.
